Cotton Maturing Slowly Because of Wet, Cold Start

By Bonnie A. Coblentz
Agricultural Communications

The cold, wet spring slowed cotton development by about 10 days, and now producers are battling plant bugs, bollworms and dry weather to bring their crops to harvest this year.

Darrin Dodds, cotton specialist with the Mississippi State University Extension Service, said bolls on most of the cotton across the state should have begun to open by mid-to late August.

"In the past four years, we've seen cotton bloom 52 to 55 days after planting," Dodds said. "This year, it was 62 to 65 days after planting in many cases. This was much like we used to see 20 years ago before breeding and management changes compressed that window."

Dodds said almost all of the state's cotton was planted in a 10-day window at the first of May. It rained for most of the next 10 days, and the cotton was unable to start growing strong while the fields were saturated.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture estimated Mississippi cotton growers planted about 305,000 acres of cotton this year, down from 420,000 acres in 2014 and far short of the recent high of 1.2 million acres set in 2006. USDA estimated 77 percent of the crop is in fair or good condition, and just 16 percent is rated as excellent.

Brian Williams, Extension agricultural economist, said cotton prices have been trending down since early July but rose sharply on August 12. Cash prices are about 60.5 cents a pound, while October futures are now trading for just under 64 cents a pound.

"The primary price driver is the global supply/demand situation," Williams said. "Lower yields combined with sharply lower acres will mean a much smaller cotton crop for the state this year."

USDA's latest report revealed factors that are expected to significantly affect the world's supply of cotton. This news caused cotton prices to rise more than a penny a pound in one day.

"Most of the world's major cotton-producing countries saw reductions in production, and the U.S. looks to have more abandoned acres, fewer planted acres and lower yields than previously expected," he said.

Until harvest time, Mississippi growers are still dealing with dry weather, some herbicide-resistant weeds and, in some cases, high populations of bollworms.

Jeff Gore is an Extension and Mississippi Agricultural and Forestry Experiment Station entomologist at the MSU Delta Research and Extension Center in Stoneville. He said three types of cotton genetically modified to resist certain pests make up nearly all of the cotton growing in the state.

"This year, we've had to spray all three of these technologies for bollworms," Gore said. "These pests have some tolerance to the Bt proteins in these technologies, and their populations are considerably higher than they were last year."

While the pest-resistant varieties and insecticide sprays are effective and contribute to cotton profits, some insects will still be present after treatments, Gore said.

"Basically, very few things are absolute when it comes to insect control in cotton," Gore said. "Growers and consultants need to manage their expectations of these technologies, as well as the foliar insecticide sprays we use to manage bollworms on these plants."

He estimated that nearly 70 percent of the state's cotton acreage has already been sprayed for bollworms, a rate that is higher than normal for this point in the season. Plant bug infestations have been lower than usual through early August, offering a cost savings to producers.

"When you add plant bug sprays with bollworm sprays, I think our insecticide budget is going to be about normal this year," Gore said.

How Do You Get Your Fiber?

By Lise Foy
Contributing Writer

The title here does not refer to breakfast cereal or some gritty stuff you spoon into water. How do you get your fiber - the fiber you wear likely daily, sleep on each night, and dry off with after a shower? How much thought have you ever given to the cotton, the fiber that is 'the fabric of your life?'

Cotton is an interesting plant with an interesting history in Mississippi. For one thing, it is the only crop we produce for both food and fiber. We do not eat the lint (at least I don't), but we do eat byproducts of the seed like cotton seed oil. Another intriguing thing about cultivated cotton is that we grow it as an annual, when it is actually a perennial.

The stages of development of a cotton plant are beautiful to me. I enjoyed watching each year when my husband was a crop consultant (bug man as some call them). He walked the fields and meticulously checked for insects like cut worms, thrips, weevils, aphids, boll worms and so forth at each stage of plant growth. As the season progressed and squares turned to white blooms that turned pink after pollination and big green bolls developed, the plant grew taller and taller preparing to open the bolls to reveal that white fiber. And, the green leaf stain that is impossible to get out of blue jeans with any detergent, I don't care what the commercials say, would creep higher and higher up the legs of his pants as he walked the rows hunting for bugs.

The way cotton is planted, cultivated, harvested and processed has evolved tremendously since the first seed was put in the rich Mississippi soil. This could be said of any agricultural crop, but cotton seems to have caused the development of more specialized equipment and thought provoking processes than most other crops.

A large portion of the exhibits at the Ag Museum are devoted to the evolution of cotton production and mechanical innovations brought about by the pursuit of increasing yields and lowering inputs to maximize production and profits. It is a story spread through several generations and still develops today. I have been to seminars and read many articles about the different generations and the categories we all fall into. It is interesting to look at that list from an agricultural viewpoint.

Greatest Generation-born 1901-1924. They were teenagers in the Ag Museum Director of Maintenance, Fred Temple, demonstrates the ginning process to a school group at the Bisland Cotton Gin.

Great Depression, likely knew how to plow with a mule, grow their own food, and may have picked cotton by hand. The production and harvesting of cotton was back breaking work prior to mechanization. A very skilled laborer could pick about 300 pounds of seed cotton by hand in a day.

Silent Generation-born 1925-1942. They remember when electricity came to the farm, they could plow that mule but also remember purchasing the first tractor for the farm. In 1936, the Rust Brothers demonstrated their new picker at the Delta Branch Experiment Station in Leland, MS. This one-row mechanical cotton picker allowed farmers to pick approximately 8,000 pounds of seed cotton in one day. The headline of an editorial in the Jackson Daily News stated that the machine "should be driven right out of the cotton fields and sunk into the Mississippi River," out of fear that it would put millions of people out of work. The highest acreage recorded in Mississippi was in 1930 when 4.163 million acres were planted to cotton. The highest production year was 1937 when 2.692 million bales were produced over 3.421 million acres.

Baby Boomers-born 1943-1964. They were born during an economic boom and the rise of rock and roll. They have seen many advances in cotton production including pesticide development, optimization of aerial application, and utilization of fully mechanized farming techniques. The Hopson Planting Company of Clarksdale, MS, raised the first cotton crop in the US to be produced and harvested completely through mechanical means in 1944.

Generation X-born 1965-1979.

Raised on MTV and Atari, we X'ers learned about computers in college. We were just arriving when congress passed the Agriculture and Consumer Protection Act of 1973, also known as the 1973 U.S. Farm Bill. The Act might be considered the first omnibus farm bill because it went beyond simply authorizing farm commodity programs. It authorized disaster payments and disaster reserve inventories, created the Rural Environmental Conservation Program, and authorized the use of commodities for feeding low income mothers and young children. You remember that cheese?

Millennials-born 1980-2000. These people have entered the world during the rise of the internet and boll weevil eradication. Transgenic cotton varieties became very popular with the majority of the cotton acres in Mississippi planted in some type of transgenic variety, once again reducing inputs and trips across the field. Electronic technologies have brought farmers into a new age of crop mapping, global positioning and efficiency.

iGeneration-born 2001-and counting. These kids are the first born with the internet and modern machines in the fields that pick and bale cotton into a 'nice little package' with no picker baskets, trailers to pack, or modules to build or haul. It is the age of drones and technology and a generation who seem to understand a smart phone as soon as they are born. I know my twins sure do! Today cotton ranks fourth in top commodities produced in Mississippi with 1,000,000 bales produced in 2014 on 824 farms making up a $404 million industry for our state. The highest cotton yields in recorded history in Mississippi were received in 2004 with 1034 pounds of lint produced per acre. This same year there were 2.346 million bales produced almost as much as in 1937 with one third of the acreage.

There are many exhibits at the Ag Museum that teach about the history of cotton production and special events that showcase methods and mechanical equipment of the past. If you missed the Hit and Miss Engine Show, there is another opportunity to see these interesting machines in operation as well as the oldest operating cotton gin in the country during Harvest Festival on November 11-14.

The November 2014 fire has not stopped the Museum's effort to teach the next generation about the importance of agriculture and the innovations our ancestors developed to feed, clothe, and house themselves. Rebuilding efforts are underway, as well as continuing efforts toward the master plan renovations which began in 2013. If you would like to make a donation to the 'Raising the Barn' campaign, make checks payable to the Mississippi Agriculture Museum Foundation, 1150 Lakeland Drive, Jackson, MS 39216. Actively Battle Invasive Cogongrass in the State

By Bonnie Coblentz
MSU Ag Communications

Cogongrass was introduced to Mississippi 100 years ago as a new forage crop, but it is now an invasive weed landowners and managers are trying to destroy.

Dr. John Byrd, weed scientist with the Mississippi State University Extension Service, said it was thought that this perennial grass had potential to benefit rural families.

"When cogongrass was introduced, families had to grow what they ate," Byrd said. "Most rural families had a cow for milk and butter, and they needed to feed that cow during the winter. They also had hogs, which they raised in pastures where they would root up and eat rhizomes of grasses like cogongrass."

With its vigorous growth and sturdy root system, cogongrass looked like a good forage and was even used in some places for soil stabilization.

"Although cogongrass looks like a superb forage, we learned animals that consume cogongrass as the sole forage lose weight rather than gain weight," Byrd said.

Cogongrass is often seen along roadsides and in pastures. It looks like it has no stem, only leaves, and it grows in circular patches with little or no other vegetation interspersed. Its main identifying feature is the fluffy white seed heads it produces in spring.

"There are no other grasses that produce this type of seed head as early as cogongrass," Byrd said.

After its introduction, cogongrass was identified as a weed, and efforts have been made to rid the state of this invasive species. Cogongrass spreads both by seed and roots, making it a tough plant to battle.

"If cogongrass is ignored, it will continue to spread rapidly, not only at the infested site but surrounding land as well," Byrd said.

In addition to spreading through the roots, cogongrass seeds can be wind dispersed and travel for miles.

"We learned from research done along the Mississippi coast that the seed must fall on bare soil to germinate," Byrd said.

Cogongrass is a hardy, fast-growing invasive weed that is spreading across the Southeast. Mississippi State University Extension Service weed scientist Dr. John Byrd said it has no value as forage and displaces native ecosystems. (Photo by MSU Ag Communications/Kevin Hudson) nate," Byrd said. "Mulch, grass sod, leaf litter or other material that covers the soil surface will prevent seed germination. However, there are a lot of fire ant mounds with no soil covering that are prime potential invasion sites for cogongrass seed."

Cogongrass is most concentrated in south Mississippi, so landowners there are more likely to have the weed migrate onto their property. Preventive measures include making sure that exposed ground is covered and taking steps to ensure that contaminated soil is not transported to establish new populations. Farmers must clean tillage equipment that has been coated with soil containing cogongrass rhizomes before it can leave the site.

Landowners need to act when they find the spreading, invasive weed on their land.

"It's a scenario of pay now or pay later," Byrd said. "If a landowner chooses not to treat cogongrass, the patch will continue to expand so there is a larger area to treat a decade from now. Land is a limited resource, and as stewards of the land, we should make every attempt to leave it better than we found it."

Byrd said repeated tillage with a rotary tiller will control this weed, but the ground must then be reseeded with some other plant.

"If a desirable cover is not established on the infested site, cogongrass will reinvade in a short time span," he said.

Chemical options also are available. The most effective treatment is a two-step process using glyphosate and imazapyr. Correct timing and the proper chemical concentration and application method are key to successfully eliminating cogongrass from an area. Find recommendations in the "Cogongrass" fact sheet, which is free to download from www.gri.msstate.edu/ipams/FactSheets/Cogongrass.pdf.

Michael Mathis, who works in invasive plant control with the Mississippi Forestry Commission, said cogongrass is a pest in 73 countries and considered to be one of the 10 worst weeds in the world.

"Cogongrass negatively affects pine productivity and survival, wildlife habitat, recreation, native plants, fire behavior and site management costs," Mathis said. "Its ability to rapidly spread and displace desirable vegetation makes it particularly dangerous to native ecosystems."

He said federal law prohibits the transport of this plant into and throughout the United States, but it continues to spread throughout the Gulf Coast states, threatening forests, rangelands, natural areas, roadsides and residential areas.

Cogongrass harms the land by invading a wide variety of habitats. It spreads rapidly, forming thick mats that exclude all other vegetation and reduce wildlife habitat. These infestations are extremely flammable and extremely difficult to control once established.

Plans For Poultry Contests Continue for 2015 State Fair

Almost 200 4-H members are planning to compete in the poultry project during the 2015 Mississippi State Fair in October.

Jessica Wells, a poultry science instructor with the Mississippi State University Extension Service, said organizers are limiting each exhibitor to visual presentations and just one bird for showmanship.

"Instead of bringing the birds from home, exhibitors will be judged on visual presentations with show boards and record books highlighting their flocks at home. Participants can enter either the project board and record-book category and/or the showmanship competition," Wells said. "If an avian influenza outbreak should occur in Mississippi before the October 15 check-in date, the only cancellations would be showmanship classes."

Extension poultry specialist Tom Tabler said the efforts to limit movement of birds off farms is one way to help prevent the flu virus from infecting Mississippi poultry if it spreads south this winter as migratory waterfowl leave their nesting grounds.

"More than 200 outbreaks of highly pathogenic avian influenza occurred from December through June, resulting in the loss of more than 48 million birds, primarily in turkey and egg-laying facilities in 15 states," Tabler said. "The greatest losses occurred in Minnesota and Iowa."

Betty Roberts, poultry director with the Mississippi Board of Animal Health, said her agency will be testing backyard flocks for all birds that are brought to county fairs. This testing has been standard practice since poultry competitions resumed three years ago after a 34-year absence.

Each healthy bird tested will receive a certificate that it is free of avian influenza and approved for the showmanship competition at the State Fair," she said.

Roberts said the state has about 2,000 backyard flocks. The Mississippi Board of Animal Health has a free testing program to check those flocks for bird flu, pullorum disease and fowl typhoid.

Wells said all 4-H members with poultry projects need to make arrangements to have their flocks tested as soon as possible. They can make those appointments by emailing Roberts at bettyr@mdac.ms.gov.

"Poultry's presence has been growing at the state fair with participants showcasing their hard work growing birds with their visual presentations," Wells said. "These participants will still receive awards just as in years past because of the efforts they put into rearing their flocks throughout the year."
